The climax is the most exciting, dramatic, or emotional scene in the whole story. It is a period of intense change and action. The main plot is typically resolved at the end of the climax

The resolution is the part of a story in which anything remaining of the main plot is resolved, subplots are resolved, and character arcs are resolved. The resolution takes place at the end of the story, following the climax.

The climax and the resolution can blend together when subplots that are closely tied into the main plot arc are usually resolved during the climax with the main plot, and does not require further elaboration in a resolution, and/or when character arcs that tie closely into the main plot arc are largely resolved during the climax, and may be wrapped up in the immediate aftermath of the climax, rather than requiring a complete resolution.
