Inferences

Writers of fiction and poetry frequently give you more information about what is going on in the text than they state explicitly. Allowing readers to make inferences as they read keeps them engaged. It also makes your writing seem more "alive" and interesting.

DIRECTIONS: Look at the picture. Write a paragraph from the boy's point of view. Do not use the words toy or rocking horse. Allow the reader to infer that the POV character is a child who is playing.
