

ANSWERS

James Madison felt like even the strictest interpretation of the Constitution would permit the purchase. Treasury Secretary Albert Gallatin argued that the Constitution gives the president the power to negotiate treaties, and that the only way that extending the country's territory by treaty would not be a presidential power would be if the Constitution specifically excluded it, which it did not.