

ANSWERS

The double entendre is both being earnest (honest) and being a person named Ernest.

Characters live double lives and reference their deception (for example, Jack pretends that his name is Ernest).

The last line of the play, spoken by Jack, is "On the contrary, Aunt Augusta, I've now realized for the first time in my life the vital Importance of Being Earnest."