

Name _____

U.S. General Election Day

Answer Key - Correction Marks

General presidential elections in the United States are held every for years to choose the country's next President. The process begins with the nomination of candidates by political parties. Each parties selects its presidential and vice-presidential candidates through primary elections, caucuses, or party conventions. Once the candidates are chosen the general election campaign begins.

During the general election, eligible voters from all states and territories cast their ballots for there preferred presidential candidate. However, the President is not directly elected by the popular vote; instead, the election operates on an Electoral College system. Each state is assigned a certain number of electoral votes based on its population, and to win the presidency, a candidate must secure a majority of at least 270 out of 538 electoral votes. The candidate who wins the popular vote in a particular state typically receives all of that states es electoral votes, except in a few states that allocate them proportionally. The candidate who accumulates the required number of electoral votes is declared the President-elect and is inaugurated as the President of the United States on January 20th of the following year.

Complete Passage

General presidential elections in the United States are held every four years to choose the country's next President. The process begins with the nomination of candidates by political parties. Each party selects its presidential and vice-presidential candidates through primary elections, caucuses, or party conventions. Once the candidates are chosen, the general election campaign begins.

During the general election, eligible voters from all states and territories cast their ballots for their preferred presidential candidate. However, the President is not directly elected by the popular vote; instead, the election operates on an Electoral College system. Each state is assigned a certain number of electoral votes based on its population, and to win the presidency, a candidate must secure a majority of at least 270 out of 538 electoral votes. The candidate who wins the popular vote in a particular state typically receives all of that state's electoral votes, except in a few states that allocate them proportionally. The candidate who accumulates the required number of electoral votes is declared the President-elect and is inaugurated as the President of the United States on January 20th of the following year.